To climb the bank he had to go around our meatrack, and as his nose came even with the fresh meat he gave a terrified snort and stampeded past our fire, while the dogs strained wildly at their chains and howled like a wolf pack. This was our last wilderness adventure and the rushing waters of the Kantishna swept us downward to the broad bosom of the Tanana. The Tanana carried us eighty miles or more to the northwest, and on the twenty-sixth of July we pulled across the broad sweep of the mighty Yukon. As the houses of Fort Gibbon came into view, we lay back lazily and let the current bring us in, for our work was ended and we had reached the end of our long trail. ADVENTURING DOWN AN ABANDONED HIGHWAY By WARWICK S. CARPENTER Illustrated With Photographs By The Author The Great Moose Pictures That IVere Never Taken IT was just at the time of the wild June roses. In sober truth it was also in the heyday of the wild Ontario mosquito and of his close allies, the black flies and no-sees. But a man may sleep under cheesecloth bars and dope up with whatever concoction most appeals to his nostrils and build smudges and paddle all day on the broad, breeze-swept lakes. It is the poor moose who has no such variety of remedies. Only the lakes and rivers afford...
