It was put forth in 1903 as a compromise between Cooke s work on the bromide, pointing to 120.0, and the work of Cooke and of Schneider on the sulfide and the work of Friend and Smith on tartar emetic, the three latter giving values ranging from 120.22 to 120.55. Careful examination of the papers dealing directly with the analytical problem shows that the uncertainty is much greater actually than the above would indicate. Disregarding the work of Berzelius, from which he selected the number 129, as well as the earlier work of Kessler, which he himself later corrected for known errors, the other determinations group themselves into two main divisions approximating 120 and 122. Thus Dexter (1857), Dumas (1859), and Kessler (1860), obtained 122.46, 121.83 and 122.08-122.33, respectively, on the basis of which the number 122 was generally adopted. Schneider (1856), however, had analyzed a native sulfide of antimony, the data pointing to the number 120.55, and Cooke (1877 - 81) made a laborious study including syntheses of antimony trisulfide and the estimation of halogen in the tri-halides of antimony, which was so convincing that it immediately established the lower value, 120. Cooke s last data on the ratios, SbBr: 3Ag and SbBr:...
