Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Art of Illumination Since the first edition of this book was published profound and revolutionary changes have taken place in the available materials of artificial illumination. Among electrical illuminants entirely new types of arc light have come into general use, and the carbon incandescent lamp is being rapidly pushed into obsolescence by the metallic filament lamps which now dominate electric lighting practice. Auxiliaries of every kind, and particularly shades and reflectors of greatly improved types, have been so multiplied as to meet almost every possible requirement. All these considerations have made necessary a very complete revision of the parts of this volume dealing with practical lighting. Moreover, the art of illuminating engineering has been enriched by a large amount of valuable experience within the past few years, and its principles are now founded on a more secure scientific basis. The general principles of the art, however, remain the same and its importance in practical life is at last being adequately appreciated.
